Tom Smithers might be considered as child of the ocean. He had been a brove tar on board the vessels of the king, for twenty from stem to stern. On the loss of his left hand by a shot, he had been stringly recommended by his officers, and rewarded for his good conduct by receiving the management of the Light-house at Holy-lake, had held with many an extra comfort, until within a short period of the time alluded to. When that building had been destroyed by fire, no one could assign any reasonable cause of the conflagration. It was attributed to the carelessness of our poor old seaman, who is, accordingly, compelled to remove v savings-and endeavor to obtain, by fishing, a precarious subsistence for a wife and narrative. So long as the light of day permitted on far to distinguish the solitary vessel behind him, she appeared struggling fear-fully amidst the raging billows; and he had barely time to take his own spread sail before the hurricane buret with all its fury on his trembling bork.

Those rocks, it thistine known by the name of the Red N see, then extended much fardescription and owners thereof; and that it ther into the deep than they do at present, that also be the duty of the said Constables to forming ourserous caverus and enclosing withall every dog of either kind permuted to go in their projecting promontories several spaces which has not a collar on the nick, with the high, were completaly cut off from all communication with the land, -on three sides, by at wid for as as the water, dashing against the rugged barriers, whilst on the fourth, or southern quar ter, the rocks rose with crests far too lofty, and fronts too steep to admit the possibility of a passage over them. one of these bays, the resistless spirit of the storm drove the quivering boat of the fisherman; and a gigantic wave rolling for-ward like a mighty conqueror dashed it against the beach and hurried it into the bosom

for one moment Smithers lay half senseess amid the boiling flood; the next his still sinewy limbs were struggling amongst the forming breakers, with a perseverance and exertion which proved successful, and landed him upon the sand of the little bay in safe y. Ere this the gloomy curtain of night had enclosed the scene in tenfold dreamness and gloom. The wind swept booming over the cean, like the roll of distant thunder, and died away in the numerous caverns around him, with varied nurmurs, like the wailings of departed spirits. Smithers leaned his back against one of the surrounding rocks, regretting his lost boat, ret thankful for his own preservation, when a oright flish suddenly glared upon his sight, immediately succeeded by the report of a gun, in a direction with which he was too well acquainted, not to know what eminent danger the vessel from which it proceeded must ger the vessel from which it proceeded that be in. 'Ay's aye: you may fire away?' cried he bitterly, but it will be long before you get any help on those black shouls; sooner will the land pirates beat out your brains with a hand spike; than throw you a ropes end to save your precious lives:—if I but had my boat yet. I might do some good; but she has deserted me like all other friends and left the old stump to wither by itself."

Again the signal gun of danger, roared a-Again the signal gun of danger, roared a-loud as if appealing to the heavens themselves for pity and a-sistance; and then all was si-lent. Even the ruthless winds appeared to be abting their fury, and wailing over the destruction they had caused-like the remorse ful groans of the convicted criminal, when it is too late to recall his crime.

Poor Smithers, after listening long, in vain for a renewal of some sounds from the vessel replied the first speaker, he's given us more trouble than he's worth already; and it's like enough to be his end at last.' Then there seemed to be a confused noise, as of a number of men in dispute; and immediately after the whole band entered the mouth of the cavern in which Smithers was roughing-for he had sprung on his feet at the first noise, and as they drew nearer, had receded into a deep and narrow fissure, which as fortunately close at hand, and effectually concealed him from the casual observation of passers by, though at the same time, they were distinctly visible to him. He saw (by he li ht of several lanterns which they car ried) about a dozen ruffian like men. pass into the interior of the cavern, forcing along a person who seemed frequently and strenuously to resist their efforts, and stempt to

Smithers stole from his place of concealment, and followed the plunderers at a cautious distance. The cavern for about thirty paces, rose in a lofty and wide exten rch; it then gradually diminished, in seemed like a termination of the vault. The party disappeared through the cavity thus laid open, with a celerity which showed that the vault beyond must be sufficiently high to permit them to move erect, and the stone was immediately replaced in its former position, presenting an obstacle to the fur-tuer sight of the seeman. Near this he r mained, listening to the retreating footstepuntil they appeared to die away in the distance. He then stooped forward to endea your to remove the stone; but just as he had grasped it, he heard a voice close beyond-

This is a queer job, Dick Williams, what dost thou think old Ironhead means to do with these live storck?-why could'ut he Frock em in the head as he always did alore? Its little I know, or care either, replied another; the ke he thinks the swell after the ariskey cask; or may be, he thinks, there's something about 'en worth hunting for, and ne dont like to make a noise outside; he's more upon his sharps than he was afore the Bill we've had rare for amongst the split-timbers since none but old Ironhead would have had pluck enough to set fire to that old teer'em-well-a smoking '

"Hush! he's coming back; and if he hears thre call him old 'Ironhead,' he'll make thy head softer than it is, and there's no need o that, any way,' said the other speaker; and immediately afterwards, a number of voices confused were heard, and the s und of ap-proaching footsteps, when old Tom anneali-ately made the best of his way to his for over

Scarcely had he regained the requisite spot of shelter, before the whole crew hurried from the cavern; no doubt in search of further plun. der.-Tom fol owed them, at a distance, saw, by the light of the moon, which now peained at intervals through the scattered clouds, that the tide had receded to a sufficient distance from the projecting heidlands, to afford a safe passage between them and the subsiding waters. Round the western of these headlands they had, doubtless dragged their prisoners on entering the bay, and be-find it they again disappeared.

No sooner had their retiring figures ceased to be visible, than our adventurer retraced his steps to the cavern, and with as much speed as he was able to exert felt his way along the low narrow passage until he reached the stone which terminated it. This, with little exertion he removed, but started back n perceiving a light on the other side. Promote on perceiving a light on the other side. Promote of the apartment, a narrow, though lofty passage seemed to lead farther, as if to some inner room, whilst around every other part of the walls were piled casks of spirits and tobacco, surrounded by every description of goalst evidently of some illiated scription of goods; evidently of some illfated vessels that had been cast upon that desolate

After a hasty glance around to ascertain that no one of the murderous inhabitants still remained within the cave. Smithers raised the lamp and proceeded cautiously along the passage before him, which after a gradual and winding descent of about twenty yards, ter-minated in a chamber much smaller than the last, in the centre of which rose several wooden spars, as a support to the roof, which was of a much softer and more sandy nature that entering one of the largest caverns, threw these spars was tied a person who appeared about forty years of age, habited in a military coat, which still displayed a great profusion of ornamental lace, though much defaced with mud, and dripping with water; to austher was bound a female figure, seemingly just arrived at that age when youth and manhood are blended into one. Her slight form seemed to be prevented from sinking to earth solely by the supporting band which ing round her form, as her head drooped nearly insensible upon her shoulder.

A few moments had only elapsed, ere the seaman's knife had severed the cerds which bound the father (for such was he) and his gentle daughter. Raised in the arms of the sailor and the sire, the insensible fair one was borne wift v beneath the overhanging arches, until the breeze once more greated the cap-tives and their rescuer with its reviving freshpended all their fury, though the waves had anxious parent supported his unconscious child upon his breast, while the worthy tar bore water in his hat to bathe her snowy temples. —This application, with the aid of the ed her senses to their accustomed situation, and the fugitives hastened along the shore with as much speed as their exhausted charge could bear, not without casting many a soli-citous look behind them and often fan ying they could distinguish the sound of their pursuers approaching footsteps on the wavering

Just as they had gained the point where the Mersey unites his water with the charnel, they could discern by the light of the creake ing dawn, a small vessel beating out of the neight, until the passenger was compelled to san observed to bear a royal streamer at her stoop low to continue his course; and through topmast head. At the desire of his compan-this defile our hero (if we may so call him) pursued the steps of the retreating crew, un-fainting with fatigue and exertion, to which til the whole band stopped, and one of the foremost removed a large stone which had man watched his opportunity as a tack brought the vessel near the strand to hail her with that cry which every son of the ocean so well understands. He was successful in his efe forts, and a few minutes brought her boat in Contact with the shore.

A short statement of their situation and danger induced the midshipmen to convey them to the cruizer, which was lying at a short distance from her boat, and on being received on board her, a few words determined the of-ficer who commanded her to steer direct for the caverns and attempt to surprise the tuffinns in their den. They accordingly towards the spot as quickly as the still id-verse, though now not posterous wind would permit them, and by the assistance of their boat, landed the greater part of their crew together with the fisherman and the stranger both of whom were resolute in their determination to take their part in the struggle which was to be expected with such a mer-

They had taken the preclution of bringing a dark lantern from the cruiser, and with the fisherman for their guide, they proceeded with silent steps to explore the sinugglers retreat. For some time they feared the inhabitants were absent, for not a sound arose troo. the inner cave, even when they reached the sto : barrier which alono divided them from the forman's hole.

Smithers removed the stone, but on step-ping forward into the chamber, stumpled over a fragment of rock, and fell.

The fall was instantly succeeded by the discharge of a pistol, the ball of which entered the left shoulder of the commander of the cruizer, and in a few moments the whole band were awakened from their sleep, engaging their assilants hand to had with the ity of tigers.

But those few moments were sufficient to admit the whole of the besiegers within the vault, and although the ruffines foug't with all the frenzy of desperation, even desperation itself is a weak opponent to the detertoined courage of British sailors. Amid the confusion, the chief of the bandits had almost forced his way to the narrow passage which offered the only possible means of excape, when a blow from a hatchet with which old Tom had armed himself, proved that his from head' was not proof against the stroke of jus-tice, and levelled him with the dust.

Scarcely had five minutes elapsed ere thirty lawless men lay breathless in the midst of their ill-gotten spoils and left not a foe to contend with their victorious invaders.

They had returned, just at day break, laden with plander, and thrown themselves on the earth to sleep, totally careless shout the present state of their prisoners, feeling con-ficient of the impracticability of their escape. Only three of the cruizer's brave crew fell sacrifier, but many were severely wounded by the desperate maraulers.

Those times are now too long passed, but they whose curiosity prompts them to explore the antiquities of Wyrral, may still see traces of the smuggler Cave.
